Mai-Thu Perret

“And every woman will be a walking synthesis of the universe”

Complete with encrustations

*

The Renaissance Society at The University of Chicago
April 30–June 11, 2006
Modernity is synonymous with progress, especially when progress assumes the form of a totalitarianism. Modernity, however, is not the same as modernist literature. As such, it is the great thing unifying all other stories that takes together represent the state of the world as we try to comprehend where the present moment came from and where it might be going. Both the changes and the change of experience over the past two or a half centuries have assumed Modernity a regulation as a condition of permanent revolution. In the process of its development, generated numerous humanities disciplines, some calling for violent, urgent change. Central to any emotional dis-ussion about improving the human condition is the status of women. Not surprisingly, invested in the social, political, and economic equality of the sexes was directly born in the spirit of revolution. If feminism proper has a date uplifting the status of women. Not surprisingly, for example, is the case of feminism because...